The main window of the application allows you to choose between 3 different options: 1. Open Gerber file 2. Import from clipboard 3. Open selected layers The three modes are organized in a way that each mode opens only one of the above options. So you can choose between one of the 3 options by clicking on the "Open Gerber file" button. The number next to the 3 buttons, which is at the right of the name of the file, indicates the mode. The button "Import from clipboard" opens a dialog where you can select a file to be opened. Buttons are arranged in the main window in such a way that in the first mode you open a Gerber file, in the second mode you open a file that was selected from the clipboard and in the third mode you open the selected layers. In the second mode you can create a copy of the file by pressing the "Save as..." button and selecting a new name. In the third mode you can open the layers by pressing the "Import layer..." button. By choosing which layer to import you open a dialog where you can choose between visible and hidden layers. Creating new files from Gerber files is not possible but you can save the Gerber file as a JPEG, PNG or GIF file. We use own and third party cookies to improve our services and your experience. Acute respiratory distress syndrome (ARDS) is a common disorder associated with significant mortality and morbidity. Its pathophysiology is complex, involving various inflammatory and noninflammatory mechanisms that include, but are not limited to, disruption of the alveolar-capillary barrier, the coagulation system, and the pulmonary circulation. A variety of intervention strategies have been used in ARDS, including mechanical ventilation, intravenous fluid administration, corticosteroid therapy, and extracorporeal membrane oxygenation. The response to the intervention, however, may be either protective or harmful and may ultimately result in lung injury or failure. The goal of this review is to examine the pathophysiology of ARDS and its impact on the clinical course. The
