Claudia Schutt-Rudolph did not see the interview as anything unusual. "On the contrary, an old woman in a wheelchair would probably be more likely to die alone and in silence than to be someone's last hope," she told the Austrian newspaper Oesterreich am Sonntag. There is nothing more fantastic than for an old man. At first, some of these contributions completely dispelled the patients' hopes. To start up the one-year trial, 20 old men were sent to the hospital's daycare facilities. These patients will receive one week of treatment including a visit from their old friends. "Over the course of the following winter months, the men showed clear signs of improvement" including the ability to walk around and get out of their chairs. An article on the project by Dan Muir of the Daily Mail, quoted Roy Gurney of the Alzheimer's Society: "Their optimism is infectious, especially for the staff. They are getting on with life. They are living their own lives and are not dependent on us," he added. The project is the brainchild of Claudia Schutt-Rudolph, 43, who is a nurse at the facility. "Unfortunately, there is a certain number of patients who are so far away that I can still not quite grasp their suffering," he said. The act of showing the patients how they can still use their daily lives gives the patients hope. This study will be carried out in a building on the campus of the University of Edinburgh. Claudia also plans to enlist the help of other volunteers who will be invited to write letters to the residents. "This will be a dynamic process," she said. The old people will be able to listen to a tape recording of the letters they receive. Young and old people who care for, or have contact with dementia patients can be involved. The project director, Claudia, also plans to publish letters of hope she received from the patients. Claudia adds, "A person's life is more precious to them than their health." "We need to think about this as the humanity of those who are suffering." www.theguardian.com
